Barbecue on Art – Feuerring

“In Immensee we took a ship and travelled north to Zug. A block of sandstone lay broken to our left...” (Goethe, diary entry, 1797)

A childhood spent in the heart of nature against a backdrop of beautiful scenery. The omnipresent Rigi massif, the crystal clear water of Lake Zug (accessible via the same rough sandstone rocks around the family home that Goethe passed centuries earlier), the tranquil ambience when sailing on the water, a bracing wind caressing the skin – all wonderful sources of inspiration to feed a creative spirit.

These are the origins of Andreas Reichlin, an artist whose work rests on the interlocking foundations of visual appearance, beauty, uniqueness and virtue. His uncompromising approach to design, simplicity and perfect craftsmanship is the key to the direction his art takes.

Here, in this space of infinite possibility, Reichlin channelled his creative spirit to design an object. A round form that unites earth, fire, air and water – the four fundamental elements of life. The Feuerring: an aesthetic, almost sensual work of art, a sculpture that seamlessly combines design and functionality to provide a revolutionary barbecue experience.

From the earth comes the material used to create the Feuerring. Air and water both fuel and extinguish fire. And the fire itself is a source of warmth and a place for people to come together.

The Feuerring is perfect for any time of year – a healthy, enjoyable and above all communal barbecue experience around a meticulously crafted steel bowl.

Reichlin began his artistic career as a wood sculptor and explored all kinds of materials in his work. A study of shape and form led him to steel, which he learnt how to control and manipulate into forms that reflect his search for perfection.

The philosophy of Andreas's father Ernst Reichlin – to view difficulties as a challenge and an incentive to forge new paths – has stood the sculptor in good stead since he was a child.

A health issue became the basis for finding new solutions. Unable to eat barbecued food, Reichlin looked at it as a challenge: he would find another way to embrace his love of fire.

His efforts resulted in a visionary barbecue, a design that is a delight to the eye and appetite alike: an elegant stainless steel bowl with a jet-black finish that appears as though it has emerged fully formed from a single ring-shaped mould.

The design of the Feuerring bypasses the long waiting for the perfect flame or temperature – you can start barbecuing straight away next to a warm, crackling fire and enjoy tasty grilled food with no trace of an unhealthy charred aftertaste. It creates a fantastic atmosphere and puts everybody in a good mood. Sit together with friends, swap food and experiences, enjoy the companionship and cuisine, and let your creative juices flow – that is Andreas Reichlin's philosophy. The Feuerring is an enduring expression of the artist's approach to life.

Meanwhile, Reichlin has passed his sophisticated, patented production expertise on to others, enabling him to dedicate more time once again to his passion: sculpture.

In Frauenfeld, a Swiss town, Heiri Gisler applies the little known craft of sheet metal printing to create the unique fire bowl according to Reichlin's design. At Isenschmid AG in Küssnacht, the ring and bowl are welded together perfectly to form the Feuerring, a singular creation that unites aesthetics and functionality. Heiri Gisler and Isenschmid are exceptionally skilled partners that ensure Andreas Reichlin's stringent quality standards are maintained in the production of the Feuerring.

This gives the designer and sculptor time to work on his new ideas.

Andreas Reichlin has managed Feuerring GmbH in Immensee, Switzerland, together with his life partner Beate Hoyer, since 2009.

"We employ regional Swiss artisans to create an original Swiss product by sustainable means. This philosophy is applied throughout the entire range of Feuerring products."

The philosophy behind the Feuerring is one of sociability and enjoyment. For centuries, fire pits were the nucleus of community life. Nowadays, warmth, light, a social atmosphere and healthy eating have lost much of their communal meaning. The Feuerring is a modern interpretation of a campfire, enabling everyone to enjoy the warmth offered by fire and companionship.
